

We strongly oppose more media consolidation, and we urge the FCC not to relax cross-ownership rules. It is a threat to our democratic system to have more and more avenues of media communications in the hands of fewer and fewer people. At a minimum, delay the June 2 decision until there is adequate public input, and make efforts to advise the public of the upcoming decision. It appears the FCC is rushing this decision in order to please the corporate interests who all too often finance convention trips and other benefits for FCC officials. What ever happened to the public interest that government officials are supposed to protect? I say this as a retiree who served our nation in the intelligence community for 39 years. Where is the FCC's sense of decency?
